Is Morality Rational? Michael Hauskeller Apparently I have broken a taboo. I claimed that all morality is, ultimately, irrational in the sense that it lacks a rational basis, and now I'm being attacked by both those who, like Don Marquis, believe that abortion, and a fortiori infanticide, is morally impermissible and those who, like Giubilini and Minerva, believe that it is not.

It is also argued that since it is more reasonable to assess prudential practical rationality in terms of the absolute standard than the relative standard, there is no conflict between the demands of MPR (morality) and PPR (self-interest).

Morality, Self-Interest, and Two Kinds of Prudential

If our moral demonstration is only an elucidation of the path to pleasure, it would seem that very few will have difficulty either discovering, or following, it. But there is a catch. The pursuit of happiness aligns with morality only when tethered to a rational view of true, as opposed to chimerical, happiness.
